On your path...

Cicadas (A)

The path meanders across hot dry soil between juniper bushes and scorpion broom. In many places, the shade of the holm or downy oak reduces the intense heat. In summer, male cicadas will accompany you with their song. Of the 16 cicada species living in France, the three most commonly found here are: Lyristes plebejus, on pines (over 3 cm long); Cicada orni (2.5 cm); and the little Tettigettula pygmea, which lives in grassy areas and rarely reaches 2 cm in length! They all have an underground larval stage that lasts several years. Attribution : © JERaulet

💧 Le Fal (B)

These uplands caused a lot of ink to be scratched into parchment. In 1428, the Lord of Portes bought them from the Lord of Montalet. Over a century later, the new Lord of Montalet nevertheless claimed them as his own and wrote a letter to the Lord of Portes accusing him of wrongly profiting from the use and proceeds of them! The dispute was solved on 12 November 1551, when Le Fal, a site much coveted for its cultivatable plateau, was finally passed down to Portes. Attribution : © O.Pagès

This country house has a long history. Built by Benedictine monks in 1145, it served as a refuge and stopover for crusaders from the Second Crusade onwards. When those wars were over, the monks supposedly had the mission of growing the boxwood (buis) that is indispensable for Catholicism. This gave the monastery its name: Les Buissières. Closed after the French Revolution, it was abandoned. Bought in 1930 and rendered white it became known locally as the Mas Blanc (the White Farmhouse).
