

Sheep bridge

Aigoual

La draille au col de l'Homme Mort (Nathalie Thomas)

After a beautiful uphill section through a chestnut orchard, you get extraordinary views. The ridge path that you are on is a former route for transhumant sheep (sheep going to and from summer pastures). As you explore the sheep bridge and walk back downhill, alongside you is a former forest now planted with downy oaks.

The draille (drovers' road) and the sheep bridge (A)

The draille (drovers' road) and the sheep bridge architecture
The sheep bridge at the Col de l'Asclier is on an important draille (a traditional path for livestock migrating to the upland summer pastures of Mont Aigoual and Mont Lozère), which was also a King's road during the Camisard revolt in the 18th century, a peddlers' road and is now a long-distance hiking path. The Col de l'Asclier pass (from Occitan asclar, to split), where the road seems to go through a gap, is well-named: it lies on a fault line in the rock. But the most astonishing is the bridge, a bridge without road. It was built to help sheep flocks negotiate this difficult spot!

🌿 The downy or pubescent oak (B)

Before the pass, you can see a downy oak wood below the path, with some good-sized specimens. This tree is native to low and intermediate altitudes; from the 9th century onwards, sweet chestnuts were planted in its stead. And yet it provides high-quality wood, resists fire and drought due to its deep roots, and shelters a large number of insect and herbaceous plant species (700 different plant and animal species, including 490 of beetles that live in wood).

Belvédère of Le Puech Sigal (C)

From the Puech Sigal belvedere, you have amazing views over the upper Hérault valley. The fact that the name Sigal is close to séguéla, Occitan for rye, suggests that rye was grown here. There are believed to have been Benedictine months in the area. The cobblestoned path (calade) leading via the great drovers' road to the Col de l'Homme Mort pass makes this hypothesis plausible...

Puech Sigal (D)

At Puech Sigal (from the Occitan for “rye”), the land has been farmed since the Middle Ages. Some believe that there were local Benedictine monks at the time. Certainly, many areas were cleared and enhanced by monks during that period. This sunny belvedere gives superb views onto the Aigoual massif and the upper Hérault valley. Around the edge of this hamlet with its granite houses are vegetable gardens, meadows and orchards, giving the site the feel of an island amidst a sea of holm oaks and chestnut trees.
